✓ For every $1000 added to cost of a home, thousands of families are priced out of the market or are forced to spend an ever-increasing amount of their income on housing.
Local Laws Impact Habitat for Humanity Operations

Habitat for Humanity officials say that increasingly strict and costly local building codes are reducing the number of U.S. families they can serve, reported the Richmond Times Dispatch on May 2, 2004. In nearly every state, laws that require larger minimum homes and other new rules increase construction costs. Habitat headquarters tried negotiating with governments for exemptions, but, found it too difficult to track thousands of local rules, said a Habitat spokeswoman. Local chapters are building fewer, less affordable homes. If the trend continues, Habitat may have to start renovating existing homes or constructing apartment buildings, said the spokeswoman. In Richmond, VA., for example, Habitat officials have modified home design to help offset the rising cost of building materials, but, fear that increasing property taxes may make the homes unaffordable to families earning 60 percent below median area income.
